EXPLANATORY NOTE

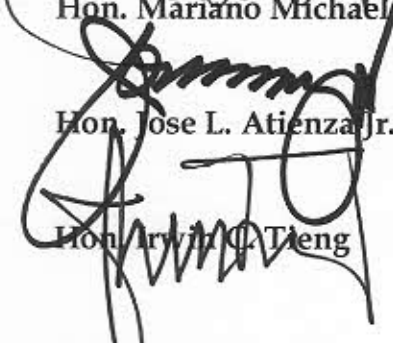

According to a report in the Philippine Council for Health Research and Development (PCHRD), a study found that nearly half the women surveyed were neither aware of risk factors for gynecologic cancer nor could they name a single symptom. Moreover, the report says that thousands of women in the Philippines are diagnosed with some form of gynecologic cancer each year and it is estimated that about one-third of them will succumb to their disease. As with all cancers, the report adds, early diagnosis and treatment is critical.

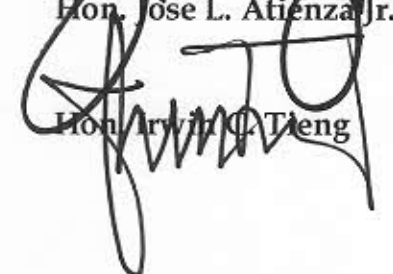

The PCHRD further observes that when gynecologic cancers are diagnosed at their earliest stages, there is an excellent chance of survival. However, it notes, too many women, particularly those with ovarian cancer, are diagnosed in more advanced stages. Lack of knowledge, especially about the often-subtle symptoms, is a contributing factor, concludes the study. Verily, the study quoted the director of gynecologic oncology at New York Presbyterian-Weill Cornell Medical Center, in that: "There's very little understanding about gynecologic cancers. Most women have little awareness of symptoms that might relate to these diseases. Women can help themselves by becoming knowledgeable about these cancers. No one should give up: Research is ongoing, detection and therapies have improved, and there are big things in the horizon."

In this light, the State must play an active role in promoting awareness with regard to gynecologic cancer because the Filipino women have least knowledge of this type of cancer despite it being the leading cause of death among female cancer patients.

Buhay Hayaan Yumabong Party List re- filed this Bill in line with its advocacy thus we earnestly request for its approval.
