EXPLANATORY NOTE

Section 24, Article II of the 1987 Philippine Constitution provides that the State recognizes the vital role of communication and information in nation-building. Information, after all, is power. Mere recognition of its power, however, is not enough. One can only witness the true power of information when it has been used and applied effectively in nation-building. Instilling discipline, for instance, requires information. A disciplined citizenry presupposes an informed society. One cannot be expected to obey laws, rules, or code of behavior without knowing and understanding what these laws, rules, and code of behavior are. Clearly, the role of communication and information is vital in nation-building.

The government is the agency or instrumentality through which the will of the State is formulated, expressed and realized.¹ One of the important tasks of the government is to act for the State as parens patriae, or guardian of the rights of the people.² As guardian of the rights of the people, it is the duty of the government to see to it that the citizens are well-informed of their rights, duties and responsibilities. It is only when people are well-informed of these rights, duties, and responsibilities that they realize the importance of their role and purpose in society.

Mass media, on the other hand, is the primary means of communication to reach the vast majority of the general public. The vast reach and influence of media can be seen especially during elections. Political advertisements have been an effective tool in conveying a candidate's message and in gaining votes and public support. Television, for instance, is considered the most cost effective medium of dissemination.³ Even a slight increase in television exposure can significantly boost a candidate's popularity, name recall and electability.⁴ If mass media can be used as means to get votes, the more it can be used to inform the public of their rights, their duties, and their responsibilities. Above all, mass media has the duty to inform people.

Considering all these, it is vital that we have a law mandating mass media, in particular radio and television broadcasting companies to allocate airtime for public service announcements and infomercials on laws, social welfare, public safety, government processes and other matters of public and national concern to increase awareness and inform the public of their rights, duties and responsibilities.

In truth, radio and television broadcasting companies, which are given franchises, do not own the airwaves and frequencies through which they transmit broadcast signals and images. They are merely given the temporary privilege of using them. Since a franchise is a mere privilege, the exercise of the privilege may reasonably be burdened with the performance by the grantee of some form of public service.⁵ By allocating public services announcements and government infomercials, TV and radio networks are performing some form of public service for the Filipino people. It is time government and mass media work together for the betterment of this country.

In view of the foregoing, the early passage of this bill is earnestly requested.
