EXPLANATORY NOTE

The State provides that it shall systematically integrate sound environmental considerations and the principle of sustainable development into its policy formulation and development programs. To this effect, legislation such as the Republic Act No. 9729, otherwise known as the Climate Change Act of 2009, has been enacted, as well as the Clean Air Act (RA 8749) and Environmental Awareness and Education Act (RA 9512).

While these laws are sound and comprehensive, a Country Environmental Analysis conducted by the World Bank revealed that the country's weak implementation can benefit from strategically devolving policies and programs to the local levels of government¹.

One of the major environmental concerns that needs to be addressed in the country is the high volume of vehicular emissions which has been the major source of air pollution, especially in highly urbanized areas like Metro Manila, which contributes to 90% of the vehicle emissions in the Philippines².

More than their toll on the environment, vehicular emissions have also posed alarming health issues for people. In 2019, the World Health Organization (WHO) ranked the Philippines third in air pollution deaths with 45.3 deaths per 100,000 individuals³, which translates to 120,000 Filipinos

Although legislators have made several efforts to promote environmentally friendly bills in the form of pushing for equal rights of bikers with other motorists and introducing bike lanes in major roads, the State has not yet made a radical move to strengthen its policies in favor of cleaner and safer air and better commuting modes for Filipinos.

Commuting to work has been the main reason for the high volume of vehicles in major cities nationwide, and this has cost not only the environment but also people's time as well as resources due to the lengthy and expensive commute.

An alternative transport mode that can be truly considered zero-emission is cycling, which could also play an important part in reducing the climate impact of mobility, which currently accounts for 16% of all greenhouse gas emissions⁴. Cycling can also serve as a solution to the perpetual issue of traffic and the horrors of public modes of transportation in the country.

This bill seeks to contribute to possible solutions to the looming atmospheric pollution in highly urbanized areas in the country, such as District V of Quezon City, by establishing a rent-a-bike system in Barangay Greater Lagro. Further, it seeks to provide safe, efficient, and environmentally friendly transportation alternatives to commuters who brave the roads on a daily basis from their home to their workplaces.

With the rent-a-bike program in the barangay supported by the government, commuters will have healthier options for commuting without the need to purchase their own bicycles, whilst maintaining healthy air for Filipinos.

In view of the foregoing, approval of this bill is urgently sought.
